

Mark Brnovich's life has been defined by freedom – and the fight to defend it.

Brnovich (burn-uh-vich) is the son of immigrants who fled communism in search of freedom. Born and raised in Arizona, Mark Brnovich took full advantage of the opportunities his parents fled the former Yugoslavia to give him. He attended ASU for his undergraduate degree, and then went on to receive his law degree from the University of San Diego School of Law.

Brnovich started his career as a JAG officer in the Army National Guard, where he defended and prosecuted military law.

After years as a prosecutor at the local, state, and federal levels, including serving as Assistant United States Attorney and Director of the Arizona Department of Gaming, he took on the challenge of restoring trust in the office of Attorney General.

In 2014, Mark Brnovich won a highly contested race against the incumbent Attorney General. As Attorney General, Brnovich has been successful in restoring trust in the state's office of Attorney General.

He was re-elected to a second term in November 2018.

His time as Attorney General has been marked by an unflinching commitment to doing what is right for Arizonans. Brnovich has argued at the United States Supreme Court, to defend Arizona's election integrity laws, including its requirements for in-precinct voting and restrictions on ballot harvesting. His administration has also been instrumental in battling human trafficking and supporting border security. Brnovich is now challenging the Biden Administration's violations of federal immigration laws and the crisis they have created. He has fought for consumers against corporate fraud, stood up to APS and the Arizona Board of Regents, relieved burdensome regulations to help businesses and encourage innovation, protected religious freedom, and defended life.

Brnovich and his wife Susan live in Phoenix with their two teenage daughters in the same neighborhood where he grew up.
